Editor's Note

As an international organization based in the United States, we have the opportunity from time to time of receiving articles from researchers and practitioners in other countries. We have two such articles which follow. Our associate editors have been sensitive to differences that may exist internationally in terms of orientation to causative and treatment philosophies in studying and treating myofunctional disorders. To this end we have limited our editing to clarifying unfamiliar terms and procedures and have preserved the referencing format common to some dental publications. What emerges, we hope, is a view of what our colleagues are doing in other countries.
